Workshop Outline

The Educational Departments in many Australian States are focussing on developing teachers and principals to work together to embed evidence-based practices into their schools. To meet this goal most schools use structures such as professional learning teams / communities to build a culture of collaboration and exchange knowledge and ideas. What schools tend to find is that this approach is good in theory but more challenging in practice.

So how can a school use the PLTs / PLCs effectively to embed evidence-based practices into their school?

This workshop takes participants through the process of designing rigorous action-research projects so that they can practically and authentically do this. Adrian will use his experience of being a critical friend for action-research projects across multiple schools and individuals to unpack and guide the development and planning of the projects. During the session participants will have time to perform research. Adrian will also provide a range of real-life examples and templates plus access to the resources he has gathered on a breadth of evidence-based practice.

Topics covered include:

- Why action-research projects?
- Kotter's 8 Step change model
- Identifying the strengths of your team
- Defining and refining a good research question
- Identifying the measurable outcomes for students AND teachers
- Planning – including identifying potential evidence to gather, strategies and actions, as well as resources needed
- Identifying potential obstacles / challenges and creating possible solutions
- Developing a research mindset

This workshop is designed for teachers and leaders of Primary & Secondary schools. It is recommended that schools send at least 2 people so they can discuss and develop the project together. A discount applies for 2 or more people.
